School holidays.

I believe that longer school holidays are better for both students and teachers. Although I may be biased as a student myself, I think it's really important to allow time for everyone to rest and regain their energy.

With how turbulent modern life is and with how much pressure students are <sup>under</sup> to perform perfectly, I believe it is imperative that everyone is allowed time to wind down and do or think about what really makes them happy. Most students' daily life is packed full of school work, assignments, ~~home~~ <sup>also</sup> work, worrying about exams, and so on. And when it's not, a lot of people have extra-curricular activities to worry about. At all times you're at school, preparing for school or have something to do after school. It's exhausting. So to have more than just one day all to yourself feels very precious, often times even rewarding, which can inspire you to work even harder after.

As for longer holidays being beneficial to teachers, I believe that they're, of course, just as, if not more, deserving of this rest as students. In my opinion, teaching ~~is~~ one of the most important professions. Teachers pass down important knowledge to hundreds of kids almost every single day, for many years, and yet they remain underpaid and underappreciated. Obviously, they should also be allowed enough time off to regain composure and spirits.

All in all, I believe that longer school holidays are beneficial for everyone involved.
