AI-generated forms of art – creativity or mimicry?

In this essay I will explore the topic of Artificial Intelligence as well as its impact on the industry of art and provide my own opinion on the subject of the project.

The main question to discuss is "Can AI-generated art, music and literature ever be considered truly creative, or are they merely sophisticated forms of mimicry?" First of all, it is important to mention that AI is not a human. It is a technological invention, which learns from things made by man and adapts to different changes just as fast. By putting together pieces of art, it certainly generates something artistically unique (depending on the given prompt), however, the result itself will not fully belong to AI, but to the people whose creations it used in the first place. This means that AI-generated forms of art are indeed more of a mimicry rather than an outcome of someone's creative skills.

What exactly defines creativity? Thoughts, feelings, emotions, good imagination – all these human qualities which make their work feel thought-out and truly cared for. AI helps people save their time, but it is unable to transfer their actual state through brush strokes, sounds or words because, as stated above, it uses what already exists.

Personally, I do not consider AI a creator when it comes to art, music, literature and etc. A machine can be efficient and seem humane, yet it would never be this way without people, who put their soul into the hobbies they enjoy.
