I strongly believe that such technologies as Internet and social networks that promise to connect us are, in fact, leading to a greater isolation of individuals and superficial relationships. In this essay I am going to prove my point of view.

Firstly, with rapid development of Internet people from all over the world are now able to communicate with each other as easily as it never was. Modern teenagers who struggle to find friends among neighbours or classmates now can simply sign up in ~~various~~ various social networks and make friends even abroad with no effort. Therefore, they become isolated and sometimes even bullied by peers.

Secondly, distant connection does not obligate one to really care about ~~an~~ another person. Even if he or she is beloved, it is usual that relationships turn out to be abusive, or superficial. It is easier to ignore and harder to stay in touch far away, while real love requires constant communication and deep understanding.

However, era of digital communication makes great paradox. While some people tend to being more isolated and are struggling from superficial relationships, others do not break proven traditions, ~~but~~ <sup>but</sup> take advantage of ability to chat with friends and relatives all around the globe.

In conclusion, I ~~must~~ have to admit that invention of Internet is one of the greatest and most influential events in history of the humanity. While it creates opportunity for communicating worldwide, it also leads social isolation, which can be harmful for societies in the long run.
